The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"Weeks passed like the rising and setting of the sun, and the holiday season drew near. The Child [Jamil] loved to walk in the Andean pastures where he would move through the grasslands and thickets fleet of foot, like a tiny deer. Often he was taken to the large eucalyptus grove on the hill provided by the natives, and oftentimes he would leave his father behind. And The Man [Gene Savoy, Sr.] was fearful that an animal might carry off his son.

"Once a fox looked upon the infant, lifted its paw and followed his graceful movements with its sharp eyes, but allowed The Child to pass unmolested. Another time. A grazing bull grunted at the little boy as he walked past its horned head, and again Jamil passed unharmed. And a mountain lion peered curiously at the boy, gazing lovingly at him as if he were one of her cubs. And when The Child entered a large cave in the heights above the village, scorpions scampered away, and when he touched them, they did not sting his tender flesh. And once, when he had reached a green valley beside a blue lake that lay under the reflected light of the snowy peaks, a king condor swept down from out of the sky, landing on a rocky pinnacle, and lifted its wings to the Blessed Child, as if saluting the sun.

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"For some four days, The Child [Jamil] had abstained from food. No force could make him eat, save some raw, green peas and a few grains of rice. He seemed to draw some form of nourishment from the earth itself, from the sky, the sun, and the few handfuls of water that he allowed to pass over his lips. Yet something more sustained him.

"The Child was slowly withdrawing from the material world into another dimension of existence. Nevertheless, his was not the state of the ascetic who meditates within himself, leaving his body lifeless and unable to speak. Indeed, The Child's form and being were very much alive and full of vitality.

"And so The Child strolled peacefully along, neither sad nor joyful, seemingly caught up in a heavenly reverie of his own making. Every part of him mirrored a veiled understanding of tolerance and love. He was at oneness with all the living things of the universe, at peace with God.

"At one point, the father approached him, but The Child placed his finger to his lips as if to silence him. He gave the impression of a bearded prophet, the recipient of supernatural knowledge. After some time, The Child lifted his eyes from his downward glance and looked into the sun: fused with the center of the universe, his whole being underwent an alteration.

"A golden halo surrounded his head, and Jamil's body shone like a flame. As matter became spirit, The Child was radiant beyond description. And all the living things and the birds in the trees rejoiced, singing a hymn to The Child for they wished to participate in his Living Communion."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"The Child [Jamil] turned and spoke to his Earthly Guardian, calling him by a new name. And The Man [Gene Savoy, Sr.] locked the name away in his heart, keeping it to himself. And the disciple looked into the shining eyes of The Child, awestruck by what he saw; for rays of Light flashed from The Child's eyes, and they glowed a thousand times brighter than the sun. The mortal man was held spellbound, breathless, suspended in a world where space and time merge, and he was conscious only of the immobility of his own body.

"As he stared into The Child's eyes, The Man became aware of an angelic form materializing out of The Child's countenance. To his amazement, he saw the face of the pure-spirited Angel that had appeared to him six years before—the same that had risen him from the dead, now personified in the form of a Child. Light upon Light. He was being made to see that Jamil had both a human and a divine nature. The Child was revealing that it was he who had first called The Man out of the world to serve Christ. And The Man believed in the Angels as taught in the Holy Books and spoken of by Holy Men of former ages."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"One morning at first light, The Man [Gene Savoy Sr.] rose from his bed and found The Child [Jamil] looking intently at him, lost in thought. It was a benevolent look, but The Man saw that Jamil was seeing through him while communing with another world. He walked over to the crib and took the small figure in his arms. A soft breeze blew across the Child's face, and the father remembered the prophecy that his son would never grow to manhood. He trembled at the thought and held the finely-built boy to his breast; he felt the tiny heartbeat that seemed to keep tune with the great universal heart of Heaven.

"Sensing his father's pain, The Child touched his lips with his delicate fingertips, then kissed his cheek. And The Man knew then that he was both a father and a disciple to the Seer-Child."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"In the days and weeks that followed, father and son walked in the meadows and woodlands and often visited the great Temples of the Sun left by the ancient Chavin people who had been masters of the Andes three thousand years before. The Child gazed upon the broken stones and the great granite columns, and he listened to the sound of the wind rustling through the branches of the tall eucalyptus trees that stood like giant sentinels. And he reflected upon the Sun communing in a tongue that only the spirit speaks.

"Shepherds and peasants left their flocks and oxen unattended to walk in the footsteps of The Child. Sparrows and hawks fluttered above. Grazing sheep ran beside him. And the fallen statues seemed to open their eyes, as if the light from his shadow, reflected on their mute faces, awakened them from a long sleep.

"Once The Child came to the edge of a swamp crossed by a stream, and the multitude with him stopped. But The Child proceeded swiftly over it, leaving faint impressions upon the surface. Eagerly, they awaited his return.

"Returning home in the gathering twilight, the father carried The Child in his arms, contemplating the events of the day. That night, The Man [Gene Savoy, Sr.] observed about the cradle a luminous glow made by radiant figures standing around the sleeping Child. They were robed like the Apostles and one appeared to be Jesus administering to the sinless infant."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"In the mornings, when the village sparkled under the sun's rays reflected on the snow, Indians dressed in red and brown ponchos came to the entrance of the house and, as silent as stones, sat outside the gate observing The Child+ in the Garden. And The Child+ looked at them with kindness, for they were his brothers and sisters. He would approach and, laying a tender hand on their shoulders, speak to them in a voice that sounded like a morning bird saluting the sun. No one knew what was said, save the speaker and the listener. Once an old lady came begging for food, and The Man [Gene Savoy Sr.] heard The Child [Jamil] call her 'ackhii,' which is the Quechua word for 'light'.

"and when the children of the village came to peer through the gate, The Child gave his clothes and some of his toys to them; for they were poor, and it gladdened him to see them scamper away with laughter in their hearts."

"And the villagers spoke of the marvelous Child who had come to live in their midst. The elders looked away at the distant heights saying: 'This Child is like the summer that melts the snow and warms our hearts. Surely God has sent us a comforter. And they called The Child 'El Nino.' And the tale was spread here and there throughout the Andes."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"A hunchback who become one of the Companions of The Man [Gene Savoy Sr.], often visited the house. Life had endowed him with a brilliant mind, and, being from a family of strong, tall, handsome brothers—scholars and professors all—he had from early youth sought the spiritual meaning of life. He came to be known as the Hunchback of God for he was a metaphysician. And The Child [Jamil] grew fond of the wise man. They conversed on philosophical matters, and the Hunchback of God was amazed, for The Child, but two and a half years old, already knew the deeper truths of creation.

"During one of his visits, The Child asked him if he liked music. Being a musician himself, the older man answered The Child that he did; whereupon Jamil sat down and began to play on a piano. The Hunchback of God was enthralled, for never had he heard compositions so like what one would imagine the music of the heavenly spheres to be. And no one could account for The Child's knowledge of music or his mastery over the keys.

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"And a day came when the Man's [Gene Savoy, Sr.] spirit drew away from his being, and he retired to his bed too weak to walk. Once before he had experienced the desire to forsake the mortal world when the Angel had come to him. This time he did not fight the feeling. His family and the Companions came to his bedside to say their farewells, for he was certain he would not see the rising of the sun.

"That night, as he was contemplating the events that had led to his state, while the fragrance of the burning incense and the lights of the candles placed around his bed pervaded the chamber, his mind became still and his body weighty. He saw smiling faces of the Child {Jamil} and his sun-like eyes radiating love to him. The Man realized he was giving in to some Dark Power seeking to prevent the Child from fulfilling his mission on earth. And he resisted the temptation to leave the world before his allotted time."

The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"From the day of his birth, a Light did shine about the child. At night he slept softly, almost as if in another world, and the Light glowed around his person. He walked at an early age and often stood on the sandy beaches on slight-built legs, his hair glowing like sun rays, waiting for sea turtles that often came on shore to greet him. And the sun browned him when he played on the beach from sunrise to sunset.

"And in the springtime, flowers placed at his crib were in no need of water; for his Light gave them life. And sparrows and hawks of the air came down to pay him tribute, for he was one with all life."

Pray for Peace in Ukraine

I am sure you have been as concerned as I am over the escalating situation with the war in Ukraine. Therefore, I am asking for every member of The Community to send with intention prayers for peace into the Sun for the next eight days. I am asking you to reflect to the Sun of Righteousness with this intention for peace either at sunrise or sunset (or whenever you can during the day) from Sunday, October 16th to Sunday, October 23rd. I know that our prayers will have a significant impact. Thank you, and God bless.

In Light+,
Gene Savoy, Jr.
