The Origins of Cosolargy

Quotes from Gene Savoy, Sr.

"Weeks passed like the rising and setting of the sun, and the holiday season drew near. The Child [Jamil] loved to walk in the Andean pastures where he would move through the grasslands and thickets fleet of foot, like a tiny deer. Often he was taken to the large eucalyptus grove on the hill provided by the natives, and oftentimes he would leave his father behind. And The Man [Gene Savoy, Sr.] was fearful that an animal might carry off his son.

"Once a fox looked upon the infant, lifted its paw and followed his graceful movements with its sharp eyes, but allowed The Child to pass unmolested. Another time. A grazing bull grunted at the little boy as he walked past its horned head, and again Jamil passed unharmed. And a mountain lion peered curiously at the boy, gazing lovingly at him as if he were one of her cubs. And when The Child entered a large cave in the heights above the village, scorpions scampered away, and when he touched them, they did not sting his tender flesh. And once, when he had reached a green valley beside a blue lake that lay under the reflected light of the snowy peaks, a king condor swept down from out of the sky, landing on a rocky pinnacle, and lifted its wings to the Blessed Child, as if saluting the sun.
